Community investment in action

Providence ministries work with community partners to get those in need the support they deserve

For many experiencing homelessness in the San Fernando Valley, a Providence hospital ER often becomes a pathway to housing. Providence works with community partners and community health workers to help get services and resources to those in need.

Providence Holy Cross, Providence Saint Joseph and Providence Cedars-Sinai Tarzana medical centers provide grants to community partner Hope the Mission, which links patients to services after they leave our care.

Hope the Mission connects patients to temporary housing, clothing and meals. It also guides them to health care and mental health resources, assists them with their insurance and helps them get groceries, job counseling and other services.

"Homelessness is a growing problem, but in working with Hope the Mission we're able to place our patients on the road to temporary housing," said Roland Hinds, a community health worker in the Providence Holy Cross Medical Center ER.

Working with community partners to bring healthful food to underserved areas

The Providence Wellness and Activity Center is a gathering spot in an underserved community. Here, fresh and affordable produce is rare, as are accessible wellness and health education programs.

The center provided a lifeline during the pandemic by delivering food from its farmers market to residents. Now, Providence Little Company of Mary Medical Centers and Hunger Action Los Angeles sponsor a program that allows residents to use CalFresh, California's Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, and a Wilmington center discount to buy groceries at the market.

Also, during the pandemic, this Providence ministry worked with local farmers who were limited in how they could sell their crops when closures happened. Providence bought the farmers' produce and distributed it to residents who were unable to get fresh groceries.

In 2022, 365 households received $14,061 of free produce and $27,753 in CalFresh benefits.
